

Now: A New PFA Division That Focuses On Molded Flexible Polyurethane Issues

There Has Never Been A Greater Need

The Polyurethane Foam Association has created a new division within its organization to focus specifically on issues of interest to manufacturers of molded flexible polyurethane products.

The Molded Foam Division will be an aggressive advocate for molded foam manufacturers on key issues ranging from workplace safety to environmental and end-of-life solutions. The molded flexible polyurethane foam industry is facing numerous regulatory and legislative challenges, and PFA members asked the association to create a dedicated division so that effective resources can be available to make sure the industry's voice is heard.

Why The New Division Will Play An Effective Role

The molded flexible polyurethane foam industry is currently fighting numerous challenges from regulatory agencies (both state and federal), legislative proposals that demonstrate little understanding of the industry's safety record, workplace safety procedures and safety technologies. There are outside groups that want to impose new rules that would negatively affect molded foam businesses. PFA has fought for flexible polyurethane foam producers for decades, with significant success. And with new resources focused on molded flexible polyurethane foam, we can make an even bigger impact.

Currently, PFA is helping molded foam manufacturers get their voices heard on issues including:

- New regulations affecting the use of isocyanates in regard to workplace safety
- Issues on recycling flexible polyurethane foam
- Reclassification of chemicals that could affect manufacturing use or increase costs

And there are numerous other emerging issues.

Why You Should Become Involved

As a molded foam manufacturer, you could represent your company and convey its positions to numerous regulators and policy makers by yourself, but it takes significant resources and time to keep up with everything. Through PFA's Molded Foam Division, we will keep you informed, ask for your input so your company position is understood, and advocate on your behalf and on behalf of many others. Our collective voices ultimately make more impact, often with less overall cost to you. To learn more, contact Bob Luedeka at 865.657.9840 or rluedeka@pfa.org.

Together, our impact is much greater. Contact Bob Luedeka today to learn more about how PFA's new Molded Foam Division can give your company a bigger, more powerful presence.
